

I just viewed the January 12th episode of "The Road to the White House". I was disappointed that the Vice President's New Hampshire trip monopolized $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours of coverage. That was an hour and a half of hand shaking and photo-ops. Surely the country could have understood his activities in a half hour. The other hour could have been spent on the democrats or the other third party candidates. I saw an article recently that said the Libertarian Party is growing across the country. They even have two state legislators in New Hampshire. Maybe if the news organizations would show these third party candidates more, more substantive issues would be discussed in the campaign.

Keep up the good work.
