Dear Brian:

Last Thursday, I watched "A Conversation With Ross Perot." It was an excellent show, in spite of you.

Instead of the unbiased, personable Brian Lamb I've come to know, I saw a curt, peevish Brian Lamb who clearly wanted to be elsewhere — anywhere but in Dallas interviewing Ross Perot.

From the start, your ill temper was obvious. You glowered at the camera and you glowered at Ross Perot. During his museum tour, you asked Mr. Perot to explain each exhibit, then abruptly cut him off and moved to the next display. Perot's descriptions and background stories may have been boring to you, Brian, but I found them fascinating and wanted to hear more.

Time constraints may explain your rush during the tour, but nothing can excuse your rudeness, which continued unabated for the rest of the show. Perot was your invited guest. He deserved to be treated with courtesy and respect.

In the future, if you can't keep your feelings to yourself, please bring in a professional host who can.

Your treatment of Mr. Perot was abominable. You owe him an apology.

Sincerely,
