

██████████
PROFESSOR EMERITUS HUMANITIES AND SCIENCES
PRESIDENT, CALIFORNIA INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL STUDIES

STANFORD UNIVERSITY
HOOVER INSTITUTION
STANFORD, CA 94305-6010

██████████
STANFORD, CA 94035-8441

EMAIL ██████████

te of International Studies

e Interdisciplinary Network

message was sent to the members of this your splendid work. ██████████
██████████

As you surely know, C-Span has conducted a year-long campaign promoting Tocqueville's account of democracy in America. In Oxford, in the 30s, I taught a course on Tocqueville--the worst course I ever taught, since I had never been in America. I couldn't understand why he had been selected. Now, every literate American has heard of Tocqueville. I am wondering what is behind this admirable blitz campaign, why of the many 19th century European accounts of travels in America it was chosen.

Some listeners have complained that they are not interested in Tocqueville. The C-Span host, Brian Lamb has reassured them that other accounts will be taken up in future. Historian Stanley Kutler, appearing on the program, suggested Lord Bryce. Brian Lamb, an unusually widely-read man, asked who he was. Here are a few details. Bryce was popular and highly respected in the United States, a country he knew well and where he served as ambassador from 1907 to 1913. Bryce Canyon National Park is named after him. His book THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH (1888) was generally regarded as the most penetrating study of the American system.

He served as Regius Professor of Civil Law at Oxford and was a prominent member of the Liberal Party. He was under-secretary for foreign affairs under Gladstone, and later secretary of state for Ireland. Born in Belfast, he, like Gladstone, favored Irish home rule. He became a member of the International Court and was a key figure in the founding of the League of Nations.

MESSAGE TO BRIAN LAMB: Next on your program, please: THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH.

Address correspondence to ██████████ Hoover Institution, Stanford University, Stanford CA 94305-6010 ██████████ Founded in 1965, the California Institute of International Studies (CIIS) is a worldwide network of specialists representing various academic disciplines and professions. They form a comity linked by an interest in international affairs, understood in the broadest sense. They are elected by present members solely on the basis of their professional standing. For an account of the aims of CIIS and a list of members, see its home page: <http://www.stanford.edu/group/CIIS>

California Institute of International Studies

A Worldwide Interdisciplinary Network

[REDACTED]

Dear Bryan Lamb: This e-mail message was sent to the members of this Institute. Congratulations on your splendid work. [REDACTED]

As you surely know, C-Span has conducted a year-long campaign promoting Tocqueville's account of democracy in America. In Oxford, in the 30s, I taught a course on Tocqueville--the worst course I ever taught, since I had never been in America. I couldn't understand why he had been selected. Now, every literate American has heard of Tocqueville. I am wondering what is behind this admirable blitz campaign, why of the many 19th century European accounts of travels in America it was chosen.

Some listeners have complained that they are not interested in Tocqueville. The C-Span host, Brian Lamb has reassured them that other accounts will be taken up in future. Historian Stanley Kutler, appearing on the program, suggested Lord Bryce. Brian Lamb, an unusually widely-read man, asked who he was. Here are a few details. Bryce was popular and highly respected in the United States, a country he knew well and where he served as ambassador from 1907 to 1913. Bryce Canyon National Park is named after him. His book THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH (1888) was generally regarded as the most penetrating study of the American system.

He served as Regius Professor of Civil Law at Oxford and was a prominent member of the Liberal Party. He was under-secretary for foreign affairs under Gladstone, and later secretary of state for Ireland. Born in Belfast, he, like Gladstone, favored Irish home rule. He became a member of the International Court and was a key figure in the founding of the League of Nations.

MESSAGE TO BRIAN LAMB: Next on your program, please: THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH.

Address correspondence to [REDACTED] Hoover Institution, Stanford University, Stanford CA 94305-6010 [REDACTED] Founded in 1965, the California Institute of International Studies (CIIS) is a worldwide network of specialists representing various academic disciplines and professions. They form a comity linked by an interest in international affairs, understood in the broadest sense. They are elected by present members solely on the basis of their professional standing. For an account of the aims of CIIS and a list of members, see its home page: <http://www.stanford.edu/group/CIIS>