Dear Ladies and Gentlemen:

As I watch Washington Journal in the morning, here in Chicago, it occurred to me that many of the people who call in are the following:

- 1) Ones who can afford a long distance call (older retired Americans, business people).
- 2) Those who represent a political party willing to have the same people call and get their point across (anti abortion, religious right, NRA, etc.).
- 3) Those who don't go to a work place.

The program is on early in the morning when most are going to work. They are not represented.

It would be great if a computer could block people who call more than once a month. This would have to be done with voice recognition and telephone number recognition. How else can it be fair? It's one sided now.

Would you consider having a call in in the evening when people are home from work?

Thank you.

Sincerely,
