Dear Mr. Lamb:

Along with what must have been a large number of other people, I have just spent twelve hours viewing "Rhodes Scholars: The Oxford/American Connection."

I found it to be an absolutely fascinating look at a world I'd only heard about. How lucky the students--Rhodes Scholars or not--are to have the opportunity to study in such a manner in such a setting. I hope that the little eight-year-old girl whose mother called from Charlottesville is stimulated enough to pursue this course. And I hope the Oxford portrayed still exists when her time comes.

Incidentally, one of the towns in this country with the name of Oxford is in our state. If I had known nothing of Oxford at all, the name would have told me that it was at a river and that the surrounding area was probably agrarian: the ford (or place to cross the river) for the oxen.

Unfortunately, our VCR was not working and I was not able to tape any of the series. Will it be repeated? How about around the time of the reunion of Rhodes Scholars at Georgetown University?

Thank you for asking questions just as I thought of them. Thanks to C-SPAN for bringing the program to us.

Sincerely,
