WASHINGTON, D.C. 20001

Dear Mr Lamb,

Over two years ago I wrote you about the excellent political coverage we receive from C-Span. The book programs, also, are stimulating and informative. All contribute to the increase in my knowledge of our world.

The Washington Journal covers many aspects of our daily lives and I wondered if the marked, attached section of the "The New York Times" April 2 1998 has ever been discussed on that program? If it has, I missed the discussion. I had hoped that one of your callers would question Dr. Lester Thurow about the "millennium bug" when he was a guest on C-Span last week. Perhaps you consider such questions bizarre. However, executives at Barclays Bank are generally known for their conservative not daffy views and even Prime Minister, Tony Blair, seems to be treating subject seriously.

While many of your callers express interest in the new technology, the nation's and their own financial state, the majority of the comments lately seem to be about the President's private life. I, of course, have no more knowledge than the rest of your viewers if the allegations are correct or not. Nevertheless, I find it bewildering to hear middle-age men expressing their inability to explain alleged behaviors of Mr. Clinton to their children and grand children. I wonder if they have been to the movies lately or watched T.V. shows or just walked through the parks, streets, schools and on the beaches of any North American town? The words and expletives that children, even pre-puberty ones use would have been banned from adult books thirty years ago. I am not suggesting that all this is right or good but this is a different world than the one those rather complacent and, maybe, hypocritical males grew up in.

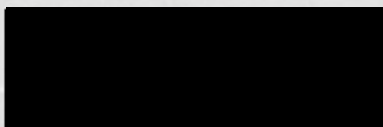

On another note, I really appreciate the views of

S-WJ

Washington that are shown periodically. Would it be possible for captions to be placed on the screen? The White House is likely known to all your citizens but the other monuments, parks and streets are not and, in any case, we all need reminding occasionally.

Finally, may I ask for some Canadian news once in a while? There must be something of interest coming out of the north besides cold weather.

Yours sincerely,
