The most boring show by far was the "think tank" of Nat Public Radio. What is it that makes you in the media think you're so interesting you're constantly interviewing yourselves? That trend, which is increasing, should decrease.

If you have one man in the House of Representatives speaking to nobody, why televise it? If, as you say, you have commitment (commitment to whom?), why not broadcast that, taped in the early morning hours when you have the fewest viewers?

[I am put off by the number of people who call on another subject than being discussed. Come down even over harder on that.

I am not much interested in listeners' comments. I am interested in listeners' questions. Ask for questions; accept comments, if pertinent, but de-emphasize them.

As to having more "doers" or I am interested in people who know the subject, whether they come from politics, academia, or elsewhere.

Repeats of earlier shows should be avoided; only repeat if interesting. There should be far more educational material (background material). These should be repeated.
