Dear Sir/Madam:

I schedule my early evening viewing around "The Evening News from Moscow" (or next morning).

It would be more helpful to USA viewers if there were English subtitles in place of the Russian alphabet. This includes signs, newspapers, written documents, maps (especially), whatever is written in Russian.

I know that there is computer software developed that has instantaneous translation capabilities (as seen on Computer Chronicles, a weekly PBS program). I do so very much enjoy the lady's successful attempt in translating every spoken word of the broadcast, regardless of the velocity of her speech. No one holds a candle to her!

You should be able to make a "photograph" from the t.v. screen, run that through a computer and "voila!", get an instant translation side-by-side. I know that they have software for French, German, Italian. Anyway, the very best of luck!

Gratefully yours,
