There have always been, and will always be, good sounding reasons for stealing freedom, and thus there will always be those treasonously wishing to make careers of doing so.

We have the Bill of Rights to establish the principle that it does not matter how good sounding your reason is for stealing freedom; you can't do it.

There is a special place in political hell for professional antifreedomists like you, and I intend to do my personal best to hold the door open and wave as you go by.

In fact, I'm hoping for a resurrection of the treason laws, so that we can deal properly with subversive professional antipleasurists such as yourself, once the drug laws have been repealed.

Your very existence is proof that, although politicians take an oath to protect the Constitution from enemies both within and without, a great number of pleasure-hating false religionists and assorted powermongers treasonously seek social power for the specific purpose of becoming enemies of the Constitution from within.

Because the drug laws will always be self-evidently unconstitutional, it is not drugs that are illegal; it is the drug laws that are illegal.

The real drug problem has always been those expecting payment for calling drugs a problem; without the professional-pleasurehater-promulgated drug laws, which take the matter out of the realm of regulation and into the realm of desperation, which created heroin and cocaine as social phenomena from milder drugs, there would be no needles underfoot on our streets, necessary to stretch a diminished supply, and no crime or poverty, because of proper pricing.

But, will the professional pleasurehaters and social engineers admit they caused, not cured, the drug problem? Nooooo. If you're in for a dime, you're in for a dollar.

The power structure has run out of things to do, and now has nothing left to do but make a tax-driven growth industry of attacking public freedom while calling it public service.

A war against drugs is a war against freedom; a war against freedom is treason.
