Dear C-SPAN:

I have just finished watching Journalists Round Table, one of my never-to-be-missed programs. The others are America and the Courts and Booknotes. I doubt that I would ever spend the time trying to call-in, but I do have a few thoughts that might interest you.

For the first time I watched both conventions on C-SPAN. Never again! No wonder the delegates move about and don't pay attention. I think you should broadcast the sessions in their entirety, but I will be watching Michael Lerner in 1996, providing they and I are still around.

So many people accuse you of being biased, that I have watched carefully - whom you leave, what you say, even your body language. It is nonsense. There is no discernable bias.

Does part of the fee I pay the local cable company help support C-SPAN? I hope so.

I enjoyed the retrospectives on former conventions. They brought back memories, as I look through all of them as an adult. A real broken record - the same themes every time. Some problems never get solved.

When I began watching your call-in programs, I was appalled by people's misunderstanding of what was being said, but I am inured to it now, and often find the calls hilariously funny. Is that good or bad?

C-SPAN has broadened my understanding of the way my government works and the thinking of some of the people in your audience. It is a good idea, and I congratulate the people who thought of it.

Very truly yours,
